A long way from home

OUR Christmas always was utterly according to the script, practically written by Noel Coward.

It didn't matter if it was a bushfire fireball 104 fahrenheit classic, north wind and all, we still had hot turkey, hot pork and hot plum pudding with brandy sauce.

My mother, of course, boiled up all the shillings and put them in the pudding. She was smart, she had prior knowledge where the shillings were located. The smaller you were the better your chance of good silver booty.

My father always delivered the presents to the ends of our beds at 1 am on Christmas morn, naively thinking we were asleep. Presents were opened at 1.05 am.

This week we thought we would ask some well-known people who were not born here to probe their memories and tell of their Christmases long ago.

Our first contact was Professor Julius Sumner Miller, you know, the wonderful scientist who does

"We always had a Christmas tree, a real one cut a few days before. We would have straw on the wooden floor where we would sit and the big ceremony would start about 6 pm.

"We would sing Christmas songs and we had a Father Christmas. Father would be the best candidate for that job, but when we were seven or more and a bit cynical, sometimes a neighbour would take it on to trick us.

"Each child would be called forward one by one. And this was quite a business — it took hours. You always had to recite something for Father Christmas, a few verses. And he would talk, ask you whether you had been good.

"A lovely time. You know, you make me feel very nostalgic."

Joe Galini, the Saba furniture man, went back over 24 years to Lebanon: "Our Christmas had more atmosphere. We were in Beirut, there was snow. Pine trees and reindeer were real to us.

"Christmas was a very big family thing. We didn't receive not just celebrated on the one day. There is the four weeks leading up to Christmas. It is the tradition for the children to have the picture calendar. There is a window for each day, so you open up a new little picture every morning until Christmas. The excitement builds.

"And in the European style everything happens on Christmas Eve. As you know the Danes are pretty good at eating. Very big dinner. First there is a rice dish with an almond in it. The person who gets the almond gets a special prize.

"The main dish is goose or duck and after the eating is all over, it is time to go to the tree. Of course, the children almost die with frustration wanting to get the dinner over. They have to walk around the tree and sing songs before they can open the presents."

Franco Cozzo, the Footscray furniture importer, thought back to Christmas in Sicily: "Very, very special family time, when all the family get together.

the Cadbury ads on television? He wasn't easy to find. We called him in California.

"Christmas for us," he said, "was very simple. My mother came from Lithuania and my father from Latvia. We lived on a small farm and made a hand to mouth living.

"At Christmas we would cut a tree in the wood and decorate it with rings of paper, stuck together with flour and water paste. And we made stars out of coloured paper to put on the top.

"My best present? One year my father made me a sled, the blacksmith made the rails. Before that we used to sled down the snow on our bellies using a barrel stave. If you were a bit broad in the behind you had to use two staves."

Sir Arvi Parbo, chairman and managing director of Western Mining, Chairman of Alco, thought back to Christmas in Estonia: "It was always very cold — sometimes even minus 30 centigrade. It was dark until 10.30 am, then dark by three in the afternoon.

toys, we received money and clothes. On Christmas morn we got our new clothes, new shoes, new socks, new shorts, shirt, the whole outfit. Then it was the tradition to go round and call on all members of our family, uncle, aunt, knock, knock.

"They would give us a couple of dollars. But Christmas wasn't just on the 25th. It went for four days to a week, 24 hours a day, plenty of feasting and celebrating.

Wolf Blass, the famous Barossa wine maker, went back to the town of Stadtlm in East Germany: "The biggest shock I ever had was when I first went to England in 1957, Christmas was just one helluva party. In Germany it was a serious family affair.

"We started looking forward to Christmas on St Nicholas Day, around November 7. Then you would get warned — if you were a good boy he'd bring you some goodies, if you were bad you'd get a smack on the bottom."

Eric Jansen, Danish consul in Melbourne: "In Denmark it is "My mother had a special pasta, special lasagne, special dry ham, smoked. Church in the morning then at twelve to one we opened the presents. Christmas tree with big illumination.

"Everybody talked to each other, everybody kissed each other, everybody made peace. If you were upset with somebody, your enemy, this was the time to be friendly again."

Then we spoke to Gupta Surinder, tourist promotion manager in the India Tourist Office. He told us he was a Hindu and back home in Delhi his family didn't celebrate Christmas, but you wouldn't believe how many did. Eight to 10 per cent of the population were Christian and after all, St Thomas, the apostle, died on the coast of Goa.

In Delhi, they conducted Christmas in the traditional British style with turkey, bread sauce, potatoes, followed by plum pudding.

And that's what we will be doing. And I don't care if the temperature hits 50 degrees Celsius.

AND CH AT WINDSOR

A right

THAT Christmas Eve rush, when you're snapping up presents, has a certain parallel in the halls of Windsor Castle.

But for the three dozen or so Royals gathered to celebrate Christmas '84, the rush will be to tear presents.

Traditionally, Christmas Eve is when the Queen, the Queen Mother and the royal family exchange their gifts. Soon after tea-time the Christmas Room will echo to the delighted squeals of a host of Royal children, grandchildren, parents, grandparents, aunts, uncles and cousins as they pick up their presents from the vast array piled beneath the tree.

But the glittering scene probably won't be reflected in the things that spill out of the festive wrapping.

The emphasis is on wit and originality, rather than expense. Things like gardening books, framed prints, decorative enamel boxes, bath salts, car rugs and picnic equipment have all changed hands at Windsor Castle in recent years.

A pair of white porcelain candlesticks were wrapped up for the Queen one year and presented to her and Di.

This year Prince Charles will be getting a watch which set his three hundred Harrods a couple of pounds. And among Prince William's gifts will be a pair of toys.

Servants won't be getting presents. Their presents are the Queen's behaviour, the Queen's housekeeper — had the chance they'd like, w range.

Come Christmas most of the family with the Queen's tional service in Chapel. And, as
